Smartphones are undoubtedly useful tools, but they can easily consume our lives if we are not careful. Last year, I found myself constantly glued to my screen, scrolling through social media feeds even late at night. Consequently, my academic performance plummeted and my family relationships suffered because I rarely engaged in face-to-face conversations. Recognizing the severity of this addiction, I decided to take action. I began putting my phone away during meals and turning off notifications while studying. Although the transition was challenging at first, I soon noticed significant improvements in my focus and emotional well-being. This experience taught me that true human connections are far more rewarding than virtual notifications.
